Only three summers ago. a French gentleman in the Highlands was gaz-ing with some surprise at the tranquil and ordinary scenes around him, and saying that his triends at Paris had edvised him to come upon his journey well provided with pistol and sword, since, as they bid him bear in mind, You are going to the country of Reb Roy P. We can scarce blame these Parisions for to faithfully remembering that little more than a hundred years ago, Rob Roy was able to levy "black mail" on all who came beneath the shadow of his mountain. But they might, at least, with equal reason, have applied the same advice to England ; for much less than a hundred years ago, the great thoroughfares near London, and, above all, the open heaths, as Bagshot and Hounslow, were infested with robbers on horseback, who bore the name of highway-men. Beoty by some means or other these men were determined to obtain. In the reign of George I, they stuck up handfills at the gates of many known rich men in London, forbidding any one of them, on pain of death, to travel from town without a watch or with less then ten guineas of money. Private carriages and public conveyances were alike the objects of attack Thus, for instance, in 1775, Mr. Nuthall, the solicitor and friend of Lord Chatham, returning from Bath in his carriage with his wire and child, was slopped and fired at near Hounslow, and died of the fright. In the some year the guard of the Norwich stage (a man of different metal from the lawyer) was killed in Epping forces, after he had, himself, shot dead three hiphwaymen out of seven, that that such examples were few and far between; they might from the records of that time be numbered by the of that time be numbered by the although in most cases the like the most powerful preparations of Sarsa-parilla. Prepared and sold by W.B. MOFFAT. loss was rather of property than life.

These outrages appeared to have increased in frequency towards the close of the American war. Horace Walpole, writing from Strawberry Hill at that time, complains that having lived there in quiet for thirty years. he cannot now stir a mile from his own house, after sunset, without one or two servants armed with blunderbusses. Some men of rank at that peind -Earl Berkeley, above all-were tamed for their skill and courage in dealing with such assail sats. One day -so runs the story-Lord Berkeley, traveling, after dark, on Hounslow Heath, was awakened from slumber by a strange face at his carriage window and a loaded pistol at his brees'.

"I have you new, my Lord," said the faruder, "after all your boosts, as I hear, that you would never let your-self be robbed !"

Nor would I now." and Lord Berkeley, putting his hand into his pocket, as though to draw forth his pure, "but for that fellow peeping over your shoulder."

The highwayman hastily turned round to look at this unexpected in ru-der, when the Earl, pulling out in-stead of a purse a pistol, shot him lead upon the spot.
